Soil Testing is Profitable Project For Virginia Farmers

Soil testing is one of the first steps to efficient farming.

So says Jim Smith, county agent in Appomattox. He points out that the Agronomy Department at VPI, which provides soil testing facilities for Virginia farmers, last year ran tests on 73,330 samples.

Smith says that the soil test can help farmers determine lime and fertilizer needs. Tests run on samples submitted to the VPI laboratory are pH, calcium, magnesium, organic matter, phosphate, and potash.

He says it takes well trained people to handle soil tests accurately. The Soil Testing Laboratory in the Agronomy Department at VPI has well trained laboratory technicians, supervisors and research advisors.

Emmett D. Reynolds, a native of Pittsylvania, is laboratory supervisor. He is a college graduate in chemistry and has been in charge of the lab since its beginning in 1938. That year about 2,000 samples were run, as compared to last year's 73,330. Four other well trained technicians are employed full time in the laboratory, and additional technicians are employed during the rush season between November and May.

Worked of Crippled Children's Hospital

There is hope and help at the Crippled Children's Hospital in Richmond for children of Virginia who are victims of parlytic polomyelitis. Since 1953, for instance, total admissions to the hospital have averaged four hundred patients a year, and twelve (per cent of these have been polio cases.

Among these was Jim, twelve years old when first admitted to Crippled Children's Hospital, his arms, legs, abdomen, and back severely weakened by polio. Eight years later he had finished three years of college, could dance, play ping pong, and participate in most of the general activity of college life.

This was not a sudden miracle, however. First there were five months of daily physical therapy; two years later, an operation on the left foot and two months in the hospital; nine months later, a leg operation requiring six weeks of hospital care; two and a half years later, a spine operation with six months in the hospital in a series of casts extending from neck to toes and between each period of hospital care, examinations at quarterly clinics held at the hospital. When Jim was finally discharged from the care of the hospital he could walk unaided and wore only a special plastic jacket for support.

While in the hospital, Jim finished high school, instructed by one of the teachers provided by the State Board of Education, and he went on to do satisfactory college work.

The cost of all this care could not possibly have been borne by Jim's family, but with the free services provided by the Crippled Children's Hospital, with cooperation from the Crippled Children's Bureau of the Virginia State Health Department, the National Foundation, and many interested groups and individuals, today this former patient is an active, educated citizen instead of a hopeless invalid.

In spite of recent advances in control of polio, there are now and will be many cases requiring long periods of treatment such as Jim had. Crippled Children's Hospital stands ready to help. (The hospital receives no funds from the sale of Easter Seals.)

Grain Storage

Sufficient grain storage space on the farm is an acute need in many counties in Virginia, the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation (ASC) State office reports.

W. T. Powers, ASC State Administrative Officer, says that storage facility loans to help farmers who lack ready money to buy grain storage bins are available through ASC. Under the program farmers can borrow up to 80 per cent of the cost of erecting bins. Such loans are payable in equal installments over four years and carry 4 per cent interest on the unpaid balance.

Farm storage promotes the orderly marketing of grain. Take corn, for example. The October 15, 1959 price of corn was $1.15 per bushel. In mid-April, 1960, the price was $1.85 per bushel. By having facilities to hold grain on the farm and not selling at harvest time when the price is usually low, farmers can often profit by selling later when prices are higher.

Figures obtained from a typical Virginia county having 30 storage facility loans show that the cost of a 1,000-bushel capacity, prefabricated metal bin averages about $475. Preparing a foundation and farm labor costs amount to an additional $85 not covered by loan, bringing the total cost of the bin to $560.

Using the foregoing example, the loan based on 80 per cent of the cost of the bin would amount to $380. The first year's payment would be $95 plus interest, or $110.20. By placing the farm-stored grain under a price support loan and selling the grain sometime after harvest, the average profit over selling at harvest time could be at least 5 cents per bushel, or about $50 on a 1,000-bushel lot.

This profit plus about $100 saved that otherwise would be spent on commercial storage adds up to a total gain of $150 in the first year. This saving would more than pay for the first year's payment on the loan.

Whether or not grain is to be marketed or placed under loan, Powers said that there should be adequate safe storage on any farm where grain is handled. A definite lack of such storage exists today in much of the state's grain producing areas.
